However, in modern societies, the state may be conceived of as having rights over its subjects. How does the state maintain this hegemony over its subjects? What is the interplay between the state and its subjects? We study the 'ordinary', i.e. everyday, exercise of citizenship in the United States, the United Kingdom, and South Africa. We focus on these three jurisdictions because they represent three very different models of the state: the Liberal state, the Social state and the Pluralist state. They also differ in terms of their history of colonial, and post-colonial, rule. We adopt a legal and political theory perspective, with a focus on legal formalism, normative, and historical aspects. We argue that the state is actively engaged in the reproduction of the constitution. We further argue that such reproduction, including the enactment of laws and the extension of constitutional rights, is an 'ordinary' activity, and not that of the state. The state, we argue, is bound by its own commitments in its everyday exercise of citizenship, in ways that are fundamental, and intrinsic, to its identity. These commitments are expressions of a conception of the state as a public good. The 82157476af
